Travel Writing – Dubai!

The monotonous hours on the plane ended as I walked to the bus which drove the passengers to the airport. The cool Dubai breeze hit me for the first time like a strong scent coming from the perfume section of Marks & Spencers and I forced my mood to alleviate as I was now no longer tightly squeezed into the torturing seats of the plane. With one earphone piece in my right ear, listening to music, I tried to avoid the screeches of the young children and toddlers being awoken from the eight hour flight and being carried down to the bus. Fortunately, the weather had also lightened its mood and had let the heat fade away replacing it with the cool breeze that penetrated my skin as freezing water after a hot day at the beach.

My dad was now hastily searching for our British passports as he was sat down on one of the hot seats in the bus. My mum, who looked as if she had been woken from a twenty-four hour sleeping marathon, was now busy combing her springy hair and replacing the layer of shiny lipstick back on her lips. On the other hand, my sister was now perturbed from undergoing a marathon of her own; going without the toilet for ten hours. Every time she had endeavoured to get up from her seat and go to the toilet the constant queue of four or five desperate people (mainly mothers in a hurry to change their infants' nappies) in front of the small cubicles returned her back in to her own seat.

It took about two minutes for the bus to slowly drive from the Emirates plane (which now looked
